The Prank

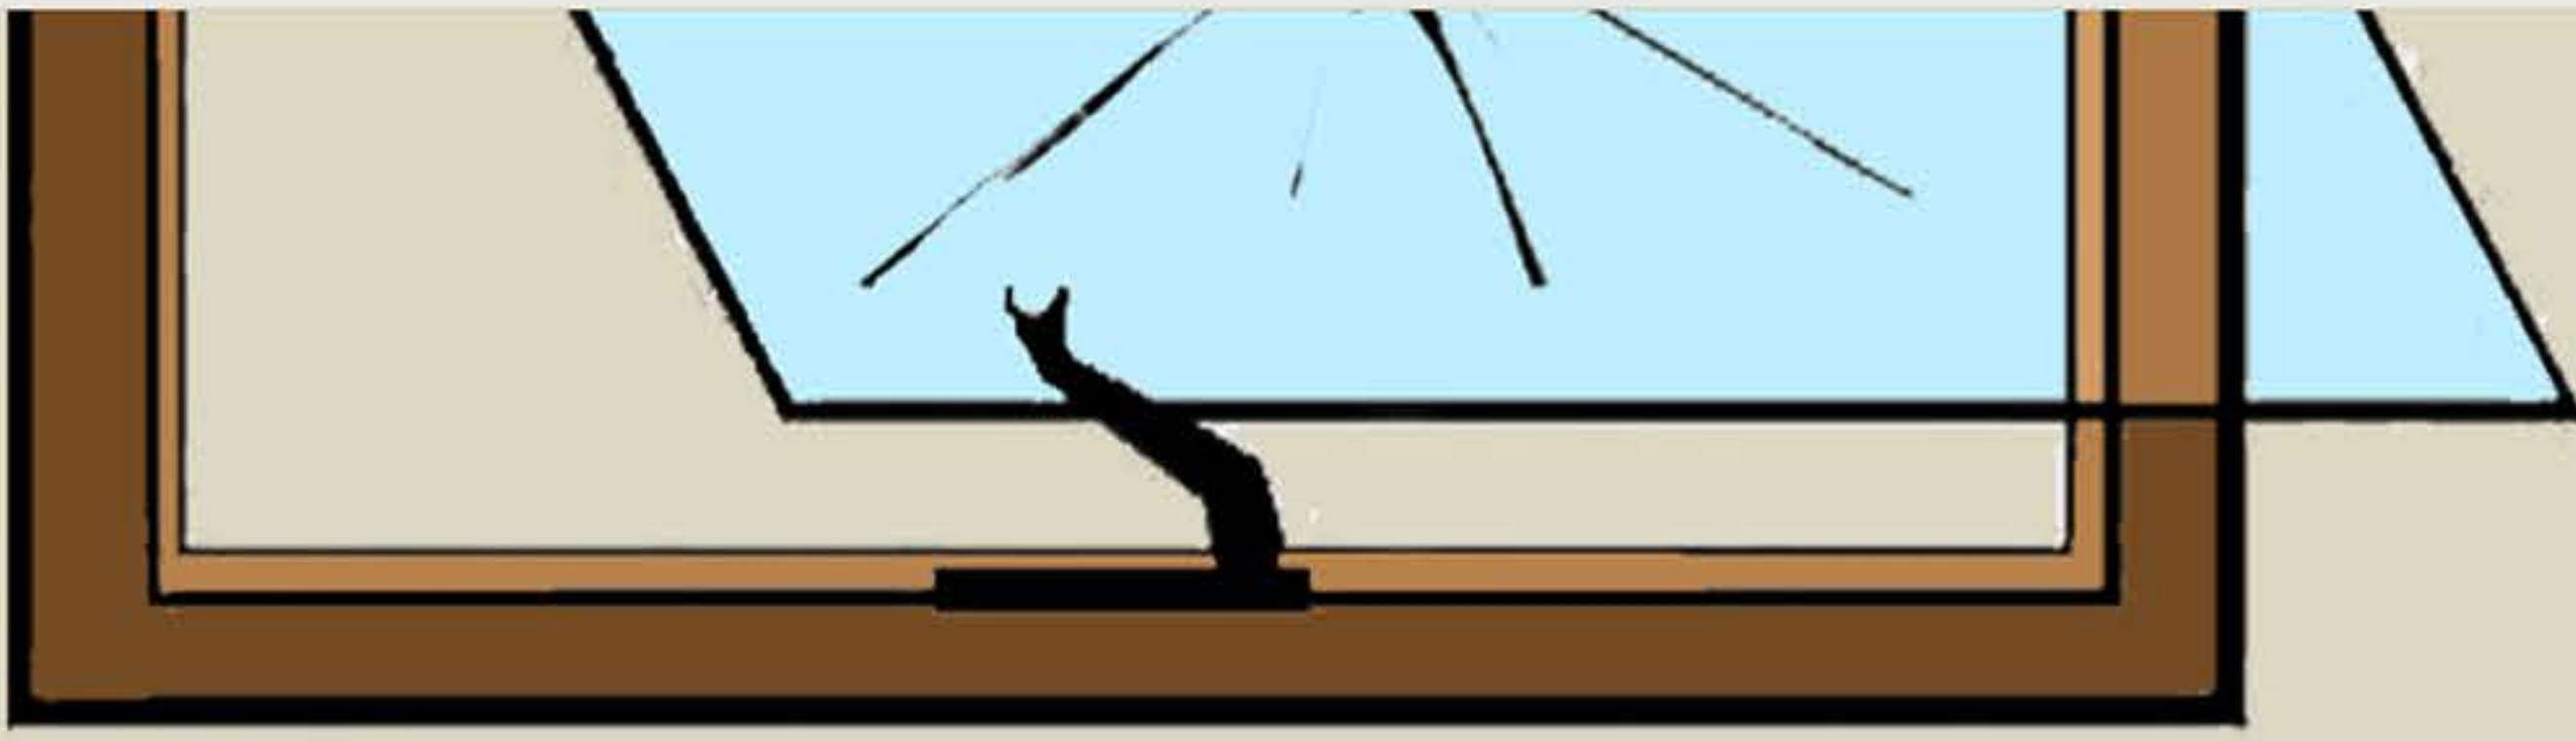

The trio had pulled pranks before, but this one was going to be exceptional. Their professor had a small bathroom in his office. They planned to fill it with balloons so that when he opened the door, he would be bombarded by them. He was a good sport; they knew he would appreciate it.

It was dark when Liz drove the girls up to the building. The entrance was unlocked and no one was around, so they went directly to his office. Liz had the key ready. She tried it, but it wouldn't turn. She

The trio had pulled pranks before, but this one was going to be exceptional. Their professor had a small bathroom in his office. They planned to fill it with balloons so that when he opened the door, he would be bombarded by them. He was a good sport; they knew he would appreciate it.

It was dark when Liz drove the girls up to the building. The entrance was unlocked and no one was around, so they went directly to his office. Liz had the key ready. She tried it, but it wouldn't turn. She noticed that the lock looked new. It must have been changed since she had acquired her master key. They would have to improvise. Cindy peered into the office. "Hey," she said, "the window's unlocked!" They looked at each other, smiled, and ran outside.

1. The professor changed the lock on the door.

Correct!

The underlined sentences indicate that the lock looked new and had probably been changed since Liz got her master key. We are not told, however, who might have changed the lock, so we have no evidence

Inspiration in Baseball

In 1967, a boy named Jim Abbott was born in Flint, Michigan. As Jim grew, he developed a love for many sports. He would bounce baseballs off a wall to practice fielding like lots of other kids his age. But Jim wasn't like lots of other kids. He had been born with no right hand. He would balance the glove on his right arm, throw the ball, and then quickly switch the glove back onto his left hand to field the ball.

In high school, he led his football team
